Learning outcomes:

Acquired knowledge: the graduate of the course can describe and distinguish types of linguistic research; characterize the principles of selecting a research sample; describe the specifics of individual research methods; has knowledge of research design and research methods used in linguistics.

Acquired skills: the graduate of the course is able to create his/her own text of professional character; is able to design a linguistic research project in accordance with the type of research question; is able to present the ability of analytical work with professional literature; is able to compile a theoretical matrix as a basis for analytical work with professional literature; is able to formulate a research question, objectives and hypothesis of the research, to choose an adequate (for the fulfilment of the research objectives) research method.

Acquired competences: can independently solve a simple research problem, design a methodological research procedure; collect and critically process relevant data and prepare a research report can interpret the obtained data.

Brief outline of the course:

Specificity of research in linguodidactics as one of the disciplines of applied linguistics

Factors of research in applied linguistics: level of language proficiency, educational program, benefit of participants, number of learners in the group, time spent in the language environment.

Text as an object of research.

Research problem and linguistic data. Methods and approaches for analysis and interpretation of research findings and evaluated data. Research hypotheses.

Objectivity, validity, and reliability of research.

Qualitative, quantitative, combined methods.

Quantitative linguistics and qualitative linguistics

Quantitative linguistics methods: qualitative vocabulary composition and extracting information about the frequency or correctness of word usage. Types of corpora (national corpus, parallel corpus, learner corpus)

Qualitative research methods: discourse analysis, unstructured interviews and focus groups narrative method.

Conversational analysis method in bilingualism research

Combined methods: quantitative method and analysis of learning written discourse

Data collection in qualitative research: types of records, recording, protocols.

Data analysis: segmentation - coding - theory generation, different types of analysis, software
